

Dear Friend,

No evening in my neighborhood ever had an unlikelier outcome than the night before taking my oath of enlistment. I became spontaneously aware an unruly street gang was encircling me, clearly resolute to assail with violence. Caught off guard, surviving a mugging at knifepoint was a puzzling phenomenon because a peculiar, heavy discussion with the gang leader influenced my newfound direction. Listening intently, I applied my heart to learn a lesson about thug life. He didn't resist questioning and offered even-handed reasons explaining his group's hatred, prejudice and mean-spiritedness.

"Your style of dress, mode of speech and form of greeting clearly sets you apart from us."

Battered, bruised, hurt and bleeding, I wondered could my determination to escape the devastating effects of environmental deprivation could enhance community pride. He retorted, "gifted people who successfully emerge from a broken home and streets filled with gangs, drugs and violence somehow forget to return to make a difference in someone else's life." A moment which emotionally can never again be equaled in my life, I stood there shocked and ashamed by his stinging indictment. Reacting to the sound of approaching cars, he separated from me and disappeared into the darkness of an alley.

Eagerly anticipating the future, I contemplated specific steps I would take to inspire in others respect, appreciation and hope. I pushed onward to be appointed to the United States Air Force Academy. After graduation, I desired to cross whatever distance to be brought into daily contact with the problems and pressures today's youth face. As a national motivational speaker I work tirelessly to dispel their distrust in their country and their folk wisdom about the concept of success. Not content with my triumph, I maintain my success is not worth it at the expense of disenfranchising others.

At one speaking engagement, after offering examples of the difficulty an individual faces in achieving an education at the United States Air Force Academy, an indistinct member of the audience challenged my premise with a thought-provoking question, "comment on your self-improvement philosophy—telling something about your accomplishments, and describe how you survived the discouraging conditions you confronted as a youth." The question impacted my senses because it required an answer of intense depth. It truly gave me reason to look at my life in a much more appreciative manner. I admit this wasn't a fundamental question I entertained every day but when I did the answer set my life on a particular path and direction to develop an indispensable Nonprofit Tax-Exempt Corporation from the ground up.

My accomplishments illustrate my emergence out of a hard and unusual struggle to secure recognition and make the case for others who desire to get strength and confidence to create their own merit. This initiative communicates the essence of my effort to follow a clearly delineated vision and mission objective. Starting with the premise mentors can help young adults and children see the world as a more profound place, I find myself engaged in the toughest negotiation of my life to bear witness to the true meaning and human cost that secures the American legacy of opportunity and freedom for them.

Rauhmel Fox Robinson, CEO
1993 Alumni, United States Air Force Academy

Rauhmel. The mere mention of his name to certain groups conjures up visions of World War II German Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, the Desert Fox, as a brilliant military commander, a tactical genius whose skill and integrity were admired by colleagues and adversaries alike.

Although he was neither wired into the "Old Boy Network" by birth nor was he interested in joining it, Erwin Rommel's instinct for battle and leadership and how he inspired the men under his command places him among the great commanders of history.

Are the more notable and distinct attributes of this human spirit reborn? Rauhmel's childhood gave no clues he would grow up to be a graduate of the United States Air Force Academy and an exemplary uniformed military officer.

Tested as a gifted child at an early age, Rauhmel dealt with unique risks little known to others around him and his grades showed it. In the face of indifferent, often sneering and disbelieving "naysayers" every step of the way, Rauhmel emerged from a broken home and streets infested with gangs, drugs, and violence.

Responding to the support of loving individuals who risked involvement in his life to foster his development and growth, discipline and determination drove Rauhmel to champion the ideals of democracy and freedom for all, regardless of class or appearance.

As a Federal Service Academy graduate, he was appointed to join the coveted ranks of men and women who willingly embrace the "Unlimited Liability Clause" to risk their lives in defense of our republic nation, its democratic values, and its citizens.
